40 UNDER FORTY

David Mack

40 under forty

Career highlights: I provide corporate and regulatory legal services to health care providers and businesses. After college, while working in the health care field, I attended a conference on regulatory issues in Philadelphia where I had the opportunity to spend time talking with the general counsel of a large hospital system. I was so intrigued by her role as adviser and general counsel to her hospital client that it greatly influenced my decision to become a health care lawyer myself.

Community involvement: I am involved in the community by teaching, providing pro bono legal services, and by volunteering on various boards and committees involving health care, medical ethics and public health issues. When I teach health law and ethics at the University of Connecticut Health Center, I enjoy interacting with students as they analyze and discuss issues. When I provide pro bono legal services, I find it rewarding to help someone who otherwise could not afford legal representation to obtain a solution to a legal problem. When I volunteer on boards and committees, I enjoy working with others to further an organization's mission.

Biggest success: I measure professional success by the success realized by my clients. Whether it is working with a health care provider or a patient or a patient's family, if I can help improve the process or result, I feel successful.

"I measure professional success by the success realized by my clients."

Dream job: I very much enjoy partnering with health care providers to solve difficult challenges in a complex legal environment.

Businessperson he most admires and why: My great, great grandfather Henry Quincy Mack worked hard as an apprentice and clerk to become an owner in a successful pharmacy business in New York City and Newport in the mid-1800s. I collect antique bottles from the business. Each bottle is embossed with the words "Omnia Vincit Labor," which means hard work conquers all. I attribute success in my personal and professional life to hard work and examples set by others.
